DIRECTOR'S EDITORIAL

GREETINGS
Penny C. Weismuller, DrPH, RN

What a pleasure to send you greetings at this holiday season from Cal State Fullerton’s School of Nursing! As you know amidst all the joyous good wishes, holidays can prove to be a time of challenge as well as celebration. As we prepare nurses to care for others with competence and skill - and we do as evidence by our 100% NCLEX, 100% Nurse Midwifery certification and 100% Nurse Anesthetist certification pass rates in 2019 - we also look to prepare our graduates to have care and compassion for the individuals and families for whom they care across boundaries of race, color, gender, age or disability, as well as caring for themselves in the midst of nursing’s demands.

In order to facilitate learning these softer skills, the School of Nursing has been fortunate to have resources that support the development of diversity, understanding and care through the efforts of Dr. Sharrica Miller, leader of the School of Nursing’s Diversity Support Team. They presented our second annual Diversity Symposium, where students, faculty and staff from Nursing and other disciplines learned how to confront macro-aggression and how to develop deeper empathic understanding thanks to our keynote speaker, Dr. Victoria Morris, and facilitators from across campus.

Of course, learning about respect and compassion for others is incomplete without our students learning about care for themselves. Dr. Jutara Srivali-Teal, our Nurse Coach, is available to our students to help them balance the demands of nursing education with their personal and work lives. She brings not only her nursing background in critical and supportive care, but also her focus on holistic care and traditional oriental medicine to assist students in facilitating adjustment to the demands of preparing for a nursing career.

All of our faculty are committed to excellence in nursing education and the University recently recognized three of our own for their dedication to teaching. Dr. Sadeeka Al-Majid drew kudos for her emphasis on teaching evidence-based practice and linking her teaching to her ongoing consultation with hospital nurses to facilitate their own practice improvements. Ms. Sandra James was recognized for her enthusiasm in presenting content and her fun and “fabulous” style. Our third honoree, Dr. Austin Nation, commented on the joy he gains in helping students “see and experience” the many roles that nurses can play in the community - where we know that the bulk of future nursing care will be provided.

As we wrap up the fall semester, we are already looking to the future admission of our new freshman students for 2020. Spring semester will be busy implementing a holistic admission process with the intention of admitting a more diverse freshman group by focusing not only on applicants’ academic performance, which is still an important factor, but by also considering their experiences and attitudes that would make each applicant an outstanding nurse. We now have close to 3000 applicants for our freshman class in which we have 40 seats! If you might be interested in participating in the holistic admission process with the School of Nursing, please let me know.

As the new Director of the School this fall, it is my utmost pleasure to work with the School of Nursing faculty and staff as we move forward to the New Year. Sending our wishes to you, our CSUF Nursing family, for a beautiful holiday season and a prosperous, happy New Year!
